Robust vocabulary = Improved reading = Academic Success

Poetry and songs are the best tools for vocabulary and concept development.

“A poem and a song a day makes learning a success.”

The effective acquisition of a word: understanding its meaning, recognizing it, and being able to use it, requires at least 50 to 70 encounters with the word. This explains why developing vocabulary in the class is difficult and frequently not very successful.

There are two factors that can alter this process:

1. Let words be encountered in a personally meaningful context, that relates to the child’s own personal life. The authorship of books about the child’s own life and the child’s family (as proposed in our book AUTHORS IN THE CLASSROOM: A TRANSFORMATIVE EDUCATION PROCESS) has a great positive impact in language development.

2. Present the words through an aesthetic experience, like poetry and songs.

Poetry intrigues the child, awakens the imagination, invites reflection through images and metaphors, shows a new way to see reality, and in the process, makes words highly meaningful. Rhyme and rhythm help to memorize the poem. Once a poem is memorized all its words become part of the child’s own word bank. Songs add music to the enjoyment, and music contributes to facilitate memorization.

listening reading writing saying

There are different kinds of memory. We are frequently reminded that memory can be visual and auditory, but we seldom discuss the articulatory memory. To have a vocabulary that will support our Voice, it's not enough to recognize words when we see them, or when we hear them. It's important to write and say the words.

The words we understand form our passive vocabulary. The words we can produce are our active vocabulary.

To truly own words, we must be able to write them and say them. How many times we avoid using a word, because we have never used it before!

Our passive vocabulary is always larger than our active vocabulary.
The more educated the person,
the smaller the gap between passive and active vocabulary.
Bridging this gap should be an essential concern of all education.

Poetry, song, reading aloud, and the use of theatre are excellent vehicles to foster the development of the articulatory memory. When we practice saying words aloud, by repeating the texts created by others, there will not be the same kind of inhibition that accompanies the first use of a word that one has never articulated before.
